PAHAL : A MOVEMENT

Karmendu Shishir

English rendering : YOGENDRA KRISHNA

Among the contemporary Hindi literary journals, PAHAL has earned a distinguished integrity, standard and popularity that remained nearly enviable for other journals from the very beginning. Publication of PAHAL began in the later half of 1973, that is, nearly 25 years after the Independence. It is clear from the study of this span of time that the exuberance of Independence had begun to waver in the very beginning itself. There was no change in the condition of toiling and deprived masses. Among the middle class also the disappointment had become rooted. The talk of disenchantment that occurs in the post-independence Hindi literature had its bearings.

The country was unable to take a strong foothold. Imperialist powers had slowly and silently begun to make a dent into its social and economic fabric and the impact of capitalism was relentlessly sweeping the country. Powers of communism and socialism with all their weaknesses, no doubt, had given an organised voice to protest. The formation of non-Congress governments and Naxal upsurge should, in fact, be taken as an expression of protest against unbearable pressures on the masses. In spite of this, the circumstances could not remain favourable for a decisive protest. Russia and China had become two power-centres of communism, and as a result of continuous disintegration, it was divided into three mainstreams in India also. Unfortunately, mutual relationship among them went on souring. As for socialists, due to their divisions and opportunistic tendencies, they did not remain a potent force to reckon with.

Given the circumstances, if we have a look at the contemporary Hindi literature, there were then several kinds of trends running parallel to each other, and the mainstream was not clear. Whereas on the one hand, there were aristocratic and individualistic tendencies, on the other hand, traditional and authoritative values were strongly in vogue. With a highly explosive and bitter aggression there were reverberations of morbid expression as well, that had no social bearing whatever. It is worth noting here that even in such a condition, there was present a group of progressive writers with social commitments and healthy social awareness, but their writings were not being recognised. It was for this reason that even great writers like Dr. Ramvilas Sharma, Nagarjun, Kedarnath Agarwal and Trilochan were recognised only when the realism and progressive assertions occupied the centre of the mainstream of Hindi literature.

In the critical period of such ideological crisis, began the publication of PAHAL from Jabalpur in Madhyapradesh. Gyanranjan, the editor of PAHAL, with his rare originality, compact expression and highly sharp outlook had profoundly stirred the whole Hindi literary scene. His presence on the scene seemed uniquely unprecedented. Gyanranjan was first among the Hindi story writers who had totally changed the trend of story-writing. In spite of his rare talent as a story-writer, he took the responsibility of PAHAL as a mission, and gradually became wholly identified with the journal.

From the very beginning, PAHAL professed an unwavering faith in Marxist ideology and committed itself to the difficult task of developing scientific ideas in Asian continent. With this impossible object in view, PAHAL began stepping forward without any institutional structure to support it. However, with its incredibly sustained effort it expanded its horizon in such a way that, for many, today it is not just a journal, but a movement.

Even a cursory perusal of so far published 70 issues of PAHAL along with, books, booklets, poetry-posters, pamphlets, appeals etc. gives us an idea of its vast expanse. Even its intensive correspondence with the creative writers throughout the country has a rare documentary value and is part of this movement. The contents of the issues of PAHAL documented in the following pages can be of some help in understanding the challenge and the responsibility it has undertaken.

When PAHAL selects the boundaries of Asian continent, it does not actually ignore the world but it focuses on and emphasises its well thought-out objective. It underlines its deep awareness of the need for the liberation of this continent – the countries, societies and languages – from the shackles of European influences. The object of developing ideological and emotional unity in the whole Asian continent is amply evident in the issues of PAHAL focusing on the contemporary literature of Pakistan, Bangladesh, China and African countries. Publication of two separate books on Palestinian poetry and stories respectively, inaugurated by Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, only reiterates its commitment.

On ideological basis PAHAL has been committed to Marxism but in not any narrow sense. Resistance to imperialistic forces has been its main object. The first special number (no. 6) of PAHAL, for example, was thus on Fascism. Judging from this view-point, its role in uniting the Marxists on cultural basis becomes important. It has, from time to time, liberally invited all important Marxist thinkers of the world, irrespective of their creed and affiliations for debates and discussions and has thus created a truly democratic environment for Marxist-ideology. Today, it is perhaps the first and the only journal all kinds of Marxist feel actively associated with and count upon.

PAHAL has never been a well-off, state- or institution-supported journal. History had left it among the well-armed Rightists with all their resources to fight them.

The greatest danger for the progressive creativity was from the Rightists. Naturally, the attitude of PAHAL towards them was aggressive, in a sense even dual, as it had to face the opportunistic attacks of several of its Leftist friends as well, who were later on won with patient struggle. In course of time, Rightist forces were defeated and realism and progressive values occupied the centrestage of Hindi literature.

PAHAL has been successful not in just defeating the Rightist forces, and poetics of Marxism. Three special numbers of PAHAL were published that largely dealt with the subject. Its special number on 'Aesthetics of Marxism' (No. 10&11) contained serious analytical articles on the original sources and problems of Marxism and on great thinkers of Marxism. It thus kept on shouldering the responsibility of even training new Marxists in its ideology.

History has decisive role in shaping any ideology, more so Marxist ideology. This is the reason why there are serious interventions in analysis of historical events. Putting historical events in right perspective is a responsible job fraught with danger. With this end in view, PAHAL organised its special issue on History (No.43-44), in which it presented analytical articles on historical philosophy, the context of the world and India, Indian renaissance, historical dilemmas, challenges of history and the important Indian historians.

Recently it also produced a memorable special issue on 'Marxist Criticism' (No.64-65) in which it made a humble effort to examine the relevance of Marxism, Marxist approach and Marxist theories in the context of whole Hindi literature.

It is worth noting that when the faith of many veteran Marxists had shaken following the disintegration of Soviet Union, PAHAL only tried to strengthen its faith in Marxism. In such a critical time, PAHAL published several books, booklets, pamphlets, declarations, etc. on subjects ranging from Glasnost and Perestroika to problems of Communist movement, history, philosophy, education, economics, information, cinema, science, etc. It did so with stunning expertise and deep insight, and the impact was pretty wide-spread and rather astonishing.

It is thus obvious that along with unity of literatures of different linguistic societies of Asian continent, the unity of realistic and progressive voices of different linguistic societies of India has been one of the main concerns of PAHAL. □
