Political science lives in dialogue – between teachers and students. Theory as well as practice are important for our teaching.

We aim to impart the methodological basics of scientific research in our courses while also maintaining the connection to actual politics and current events. For this reason, our research division is represented by many lecturers with practical experience. We organize regular field research seminars and excursions on timely issues with input from experts in politics, the media and the economy.

Our division's teaching team has published relevant manuscripts and textbooks on organizational analysis, welfare states in comparison, and economic policy. We strive to combine practical relevance and research in education. When students are in the last phases of their degrees, the connection between university and vocational career is especially crucial. Students benefit from the synergy of creative initiative and commitment which is fostered between themselves and their advisors. Our division prioritizes current topics for degree completion requirements and provides capable and timely support.

Our areas of specialization:
- Comparative policy analysis
- Political economics
- Welfare states in comparison
- Communication and political leadership
- Transformations of policy and economy

One of our most important areas of research is policy analysis: We examine why political solutions come about in certain forms and what consequences these outcomes have in society. Different policy areas provide the background for this research. Our staff members have conducted a multitude of projects on behalf of varying partners over the years, e.g. on social policies, labor market, education and innovation policy. Additional research activities have focused on interest mediation, citizens’ involvement, political parties and organizational analysis. Our research division also produces the WIP Working Papers - available at http://www.wip-online.org - which illustrates some of the current topics we are pursuing.
