The Reform of Islamic Law
Approaches, Challenges and Methods

The reform of Islamic law has long been a controversial subject. In Muslim states, recent discussions have often aimed to adapt Islamic law to modern Muslim nation states, while in the West debates mostly concentrated on the compatibility of Islamic law with both European legislation and human rights. Generally speaking, there are three positions that are dominating questions regarding the reform of Islamic law: 1) the conservative position, which refuses any reform attempt and views Islamic law as immutable; 2) the liberal position, which argues that classical Islamic law is outdated and should be replaced by secular law in all fields of life; 3) a middle ground, adopted by scholars who think that (several aspects of) Islamic law need to be reinterpreted and reformed. This third position can be found in both Muslim and Christian parts of the world and will take center stage at this conference.

Today’s research on Islamic law is taking place in an increasingly politicized environment, full of caricature and half-truths. Debates are so polarized that scholars are often accused of either being apologetic or negatively biased. A scientifically-founded approach to questions about the reform of Islamic law is crucial to an informed and meaningful public debate. As intellectual entrepreneurs, scholars play an important role in developing new, and combining long-established reform propositions. It is against this background, that this conference brings together leading academics and promising junior scholars within the field of Islamic law to discuss the meaning and possibilities of reform. It will shed light on questions regarding the methodology and content of change. What areas of Islamic law should be reformed and why? What does ‘reform’ mean within the old-established field of Islamic law and what models could be used? Who is interested in reform, who opposes it and why? And how do Muslims’ social environments shape their diverging and changing perception and practice of Islamic law? These and other questions will be discussed over a period of two days at one of Germany’s oldest universities in Tübingen. The cross-generational and inter-regional knowledge exchange constitutes a unique and stimulating academic environment, which facilitates the generation of new ideas and fosters innovative approaches to the reform of Islamic law.
