

Overview

The history of early modern missions is perhaps one of the fields in which the rise of global history has had the most significant impact. Considering a multiplicity of actors and locales, Christianity itself is increasingly understood in the plural. Simultaneously, these “local religions” did not exist in splendid isolation but interacted on different scales.

In this workshop, we seek to provide a space for comparison and discussion of cross-regional entanglements, fostering exchange about the different concepts and methodological approaches employed, such as correlation, similarity, and proximity. The workshop at the same time retains and pursues a specific focus on (West Central) Africa. Bringing the scholarship on Kongo Christianity into dialogue with case studies from other regions can contribute to redressing the imbalance in current discussions of early modern Christianities and mission history, in which Sub-Saharan Africa is still underrepresented.

By including interdisciplinary participants, we hope to contribute to a critical reflection on how colonialism shaped the study of religion, exploring intersections between attempts at de-centering the history of Christianity and debates about decolonisation and pluralization in global Christianities today.
